/30 New research has supported the theory that the world's oceans are getting higher in carbon. The average carbon content of the oceans has continued to rise for at least 4.6 million years, scientists have discovered. A study published in the open-access journal Science said that since the mid-16th century, when the first deposits of fossilised carbon were found, the carbon had continued to rise. The researchers behind the study, from the University of East Anglia in Norwich, used satellite and tide gauges to determine that the oceans have been warming at a similar rate to those of the whole of the Earth's surface. "We see this global warming of the oceans and these sea-level rise because of thermal expansion of the ocean," lead author of the study, Dr Gunnar Eydal from the University of East Anglia's Climate Change Research Unit, told BBC News. His team looked at seven ocean basins where carbon has been recorded over thousands of years and compared it with global climate data, satellite records and other geological records. They found that the average global surface salinity has increased by around 10 millimetres (4.6 inches) over the past 10,000 years. Previous studies found that ocean warming is probably the main driver behind the observed increase in carbon dioxide levels in the atmosphere, which are believed to have a major impact on climate change. Previous studies also found that melting glaciers in Greenland and East Antarctica are contributing to higher concentrations of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere. The researchers added that although there had been previous reports of rising sea levels, this was the first time that concentrations were increasing at such a fast rate. Getty 22/30 An asteroid wiped out ancient sea plants that lived in Mars's ancient soil. Scientists say that the oldest fossils of a huge land mass have been discovered off the coast of Mars. The archaeologists working on the Mars Landform and PaleoBlock sets discovered more than 500m years of sediment on the blue planet. They say that the ancient vegetation is the result of small changes to the planet's tilt that caused it to slide down into a more arid state. The researchers behind the find said that although it felt barren before the landform was formed, it has now been positively transformed by flowing liquid that has flowed on to the ancient sediments. This is the first time that scientists have found evidence of sustained liquid flowing on the surface of a planet – something that has never been seen before.
